Listen World

By Elsie Robinson
He died the other day. At 60. Very suddenly, heart attack. He must have known one ghastly instant of shock and regret before he went. For he'd always wanted to do something big. And now he was going out without accomplishing anything. I remember, when we were youngsters, how he used to boast of what he was going to do. To my admiring, younger eyes, those boasts seemed very real and wonderful. But now, looking back, I see how childish they were. Just fluff—no firm plan, no definite desire. Just a vague wish for power and glorification. Perhaps that's why his whole life went for nothing. He wanted something. He wanted some great thing so fiercely that he let everything else go by. But he never knew exactly what he wanted. Maybe we'd like to be lawyers. Or our lives amount to nothing. We, also, want something. Expect something. Believe that life will come around, some day, with a glittering fate on a silver platter. But what is it we want? Well, we don't exactly know. Maybe we'd like to be lawyers. Or actresses. Or doctors. Or congressmen. Or writers. Or adventurers. Or career women. We're not quite sure. We don't think we need to be sure. We're sure that fate will send our destiny our way. And so we wait. And wait. And some day we die, shocked and resentful because our lives have amounted to nothing, being having fate has done us dirt. Stop thinking that way right now! Fate does not make our des-

DOROTHY DIX SAYS: Right Kind of Helpmate Is Worth More Than Cost

A STATISTICIAN has figured out that the wife of the average man, what with her board, clothes, doctors' bills, beauty treatments, trips, presents and one thing and another, costs him $50,000, providing they live together for 30 or 40 years. These figures seem to put wives in the luxury class, along with yachts and private planes, and appear to explain why so many young men steer clear of matrimony.

They feel they can't afford it with wives quoted as high as they are. But in this they are mistaken, and the best paying investment that any youth ever makes is when he gambles on Wives Preferred. Of course, if a man picks out for a wife a silly little addle-pated girl who is lazy and extravagant she is a total loss and isn't worth $50,000 or 50 cents. But if he marries a woman who is intelligent and thrifty and industrious, she not only doesn't cost him a penny, she is money in his pocket. For if any human being ever earns his or her board and keep, it is the wife who performs such various and multifarious duties that it would bankrupt her husband if he had to pay for the services she renders.

Add up the wages of a housekeeper, a cook, a housemaid, a laundress, a nurse, a purchasing agent and a social secretary, a companion and you will perceive one of the reasons why widowers with children are in such haste to remarry. They can't afford to stay single.

Furthermore, that a wife is worth all she costs is amply proven by the fact that men very rarely begin to accumulate any property until after they get married. As long as a man is a bachelor he is the victim of all of his predatory relatives, who feel that as he hasn't any family of his own to support, he might as well take care of theirs; and of his borrowing friends, who know he is always good for a touch.

But as soon as a man gets married his wife sees up the holes in his pockets and separates him from the spongers, and before he knows it he has money in the bank.

Even an extravagant wife is often a first aid to prosperity, because her husband has to hustle so hard to pay her bills that it frequently develops unexpected abilities in him and turns him into a go-getter and a millionaire.

Another way in which a wife works her passage in the matrimonial boat is by taking care of her husband's health, which, after all, is his main asset in life. Doctors say that the chief reason that married men live longer than single ones is not only because they lead more regular lives and, as a rule, are more wholesomely fed, but because their wives watch out for the little illnesses that the men themselves neglect.

It is the wife's nagging about putting on dry shoes when they get their feet wet, and going to bed when they take a cold, and seeing the doctor about that tired feeling that keeps many a man out
